SEASON 1
THE BEGINNING OF THE WALKER
A BOY WITHOUT POWER. A SYMBOL WITHOUT MEANING.
A DESTINY THAT CHANGES EVERYTHING.

VOID WALKER — SEASON 1

CHAPTER 1: “THE BOY WHO WAS BORN FROM SILENCE”

After the storm-filled night where Ravnym city was covered under violent rain and endless thunder that echoed like the sky itself was breaking apart under unseen pressure, a child was born inside a heavily restricted hospital where medical systems were already struggling to maintain stability due to the extreme emergency condition of a dying mother, while exhausted doctors rushed through the maternity room trying to stabilize both life and death unfolding at the same time, and the woman lying on the bed, breathing weakly yet strangely calm, gathered her final strength to speak a single request that if her child survived this impossible night then his name must be Harris, because she believed even without understanding why that this name would carry meaning far beyond ordinary existence, and as her voice slowly weakened the entire room began to feel unusually silent as if reality itself was pausing to observe something important about to happen, while outside the hospital thunder suddenly softened for a brief moment and wind stopped completely creating a strange unnatural stillness, and at the exact moment of birth when the child finally entered the world with a cry that should have symbolized normal life beginning, the entire maternity room suddenly fell into complete darkness for one full second as all electrical systems shut down simultaneously without explanation, as if existence itself had briefly stopped functioning to acknowledge the arrival of something unknown, and in that darkness there was absolute silence with no sound of rain, machines, or human movement, only a strange pressure that felt like something vast and invisible had opened its attention toward the newborn child before withdrawing again into the unknown, and when light returned everything appeared normal again yet doctors were visibly shaken as one of them whispered that something about the atmosphere during the birth felt unnatural and beyond scientific explanation, while the baby was confirmed physically healthy but the emotional tension inside the room never fully disappeared, and outside the delivery room the father stood waiting with trembling hands and exhausted hope until a doctor finally informed him that the child had been safely born alive which brought a brief emotional relief that immediately felt fragile because the hospital atmosphere still carried something heavy and uncertain, and that relief shattered completely when emergency alarms suddenly began ringing again from inside the maternity room forcing doctors to rush back inside while the father stood frozen in confusion as fear once again replaced hope, and inside the room the mother's condition suddenly collapsed beyond recovery as machines screamed in continuous alarm while doctors attempted every possible intervention but her body continued weakening as if something unseen was pulling her life away regardless of medical effort, and in her final conscious moment she slowly turned her gaze toward her newborn child and smiled gently with acceptance as if understanding that her life had reached its end but her child's existence still carried meaning she could not witness, and with her last breath she repeated the name "Harris" softly before her voice faded completely and her hand lost strength and dropped as the machines transitioned into continuous alarm signaling irreversible death, while outside the room the father understood everything without needing words as silence itself confirmed that both hope and love had been taken away in a single night that would permanently change his life, and he collapsed under emotional weight as rain outside continued falling mixing with his grief as if the world itself was mourning, and inside the hospital nursery the newborn child lay alone wrapped in cloth while an unnatural wind moved through sealed corridors despite all windows being closed creating a disturbing contradiction that made the environment feel alive in ways it should not be, and for a brief moment the lights flickered again and a faint distortion appeared on the glass surface as if something beyond perception had silently acknowledged the child's existence, while the baby suddenly stopped crying for a moment and stared into empty space with unusual calmness creating an unsettling feeling that something inside him was already different even before consciousness fully formed, and on that night under storm-covered skies a child named Harris Ravi was born into a world that unknowingly sensed his arrival as something far greater than a normal human birth though no one yet understood why, and years passed in silence after that moment as the story shifted from tragedy into loneliness when Harris, now a child of five years old, was taken under the guidance of Koji who recognized something unusual in him not as power but as emotional depth and isolation that felt unnatural for a child of his age, and Koji brought him into Ravnym Academy where thousands of students lived normal school lives filled with noise, laughter, and friendship, yet Harris walked through those corridors like someone who existed slightly outside the world itself, never speaking much, never joining groups, always choosing empty spaces like rooftops or silent corners where he could observe life without being part of it, until one day everything subtly began to change when Harlina arrived at the academy with a calm presence that felt different from everyone else as if she naturally belonged to a place beyond ordinary existence, and during the school interval she approached Harris for the first time without fear or hesitation and spoke to him softly in a way that did not treat him like a stranger but like a person who had simply been waiting too long to be noticed, and in that moment something unfamiliar stirred inside Harris as he felt for the first time that someone was actually acknowledging his existence not as a shadow or silent figure but as someone real, and that small interaction became the first crack in his long isolation as warmth entered his life in a way he had never experienced before, and soon after that Reku and Roku, twin students full of energy and loud personality, began interacting with him in their own chaotic way treating him as part of their world even when he did not respond much, while Jekuna and his group started forming rivalry energy around him by disturbing him during school life and testing his patience through constant provocation, and during one lunch time when Harris received food but chose not to react or fight he silently gave it away and walked alone to the terrace where he sat without eating anything while looking at the sky as if searching for answers that no one had given him, until Harlina noticed this pattern and followed him without hesitation, sitting beside him and sharing her own lunch naturally without asking questions as if it was the simplest thing in the world to sit beside someone who was always alone, and soon Reku and Roku along with Harlina's friend Karu and Lina also arrived at the terrace turning what was once a place of isolation into a fragile space of shared silence and small connection where for the first time Harris experienced what it meant to sit with others without being judged or pushed away, and as school ended and students slowly returned home Harris once again refused to leave with anyone and returned alone to the terrace even as Harlina silently watched him from below understanding that his silence was not rejection but fear of losing connection once it formed, and that night heavy rain covered Ravnym Academy again and Harlina went to bring him back home but Harris refused, yet she still stayed beside him sitting in the rain without forcing him and only after a long silence did Harris finally agree to walk with her not because he was forced but because for the first time he felt that someone genuinely cared whether he stayed alone or not, and that single day became the happiest moment of his early life because it introduced him to the concept that he might not be completely alone in the world anymore, and as days passed into months the emotional bond between these fragile connections slowly grew even while Jekuna's rivalry intensified and conflicts during school life became more frequent until one day during lunch Jekuna began disturbing Harlina directly which triggered something inside Harris that had never been expressed before, and without thinking he stepped forward to protect her and pulled her away from the situation which escalated into confrontation forcing him into his first real emotional fight not for himself but for someone who had finally made him feel human again, and in that moment his silence broke as his voice emerged for the first time with raw emotion as he said "Don't touch my friends," marking the beginning of a shift inside him where isolation slowly started turning into connection, and after that conflict ended school hours came to a close and Harris once again refused to stay with Harlina even when she looked at him with concern, choosing instead to return to the terrace alone where he always felt safe in silence while Harlina understood without words that he was not rejecting her but protecting himself from attachment he was still too afraid to fully accept, and she chose not to force him and simply accepted his distance while staying emotionally connected from afar, and as sunset faded over Ravnym Academy that day slowly ended with a quiet emotional weight hanging in the air as if something inside the story had permanently changed without anyone fully realizing it yet, and time continued to move forward until the narration of his life itself seemed to pause and whisper that after a few years, the boy who once sat alone on the terrace of Ravnym Academy would slowly begin to understand that loneliness was never his destiny but only the first step toward something far greater that was quietly waiting inside him.

VOID WALKER — SEASON 1

CHAPTER 2: “SEVEN YEARS OF SILENCE — TWO DAYS OF VOID CHAOS”

After seven long years had passed since the night of his tragic birth and the beginning of his silent existence, Harris Ravi had grown into an 8th standard student at Ravnym Academy, where life had gradually shifted from childhood confusion into structured school reality filled with routine, discipline, friendships, rivalries, and emotional evolution, yet despite all these years passing, something inside Harris remained fundamentally unchanged, as if a part of him still existed in the same silence he was born into, observing the world instead of fully belonging to it, even though his understanding of people, emotions, and connection had slowly expanded through experience rather than expression.

During these years, Ravnym Academy had become a place where small conflicts were part of daily life, where students fought over pride, friendship, misunderstandings, and competitive dominance, but these fights were never truly dangerous, instead acting like emotional pressure points that shaped personalities over time, and Harris often found himself in the middle of such conflicts not because he sought them, but because people around him naturally reacted to his quiet presence in ways that either challenged him or tested his patience.

Harris Ravi

Even though Harris had grown stronger mentally and more aware socially, he still preferred silence, rooftops, and distance from crowds, and the school terrace remained his most familiar place, where he would sit alone during breaks and after school hours, watching the sky as if searching for something beyond the normal world, while his emotional world remained a mixture of calm observation and hidden uncertainty that no one fully understood.

Harlina

Harlina, who had grown alongside him through these years, had become one of the few people capable of reaching his emotional distance, not by forcing him to change but by simply existing near him in a way that did not demand answers, and their connection had evolved into something quiet but stable, where words were rare but understanding was present, and even in silence there was a sense of shared awareness between them that neither of them could easily explain.

Roku

Reku

Roku and Reku had also grown during these years into more defined personalities, still energetic and loud, still involved in playful fights and competitive school interactions, but now with a deeper loyalty toward Harris, treating him as someone important in their lives even when he did not openly express emotional attachment in return, while Jekuna had evolved into a more intense rival figure whose competitive mindset turned every interaction into a challenge of pride and dominance.

Jekuna

For nearly two weeks, school life continued in its usual pattern of small fights, classroom disputes, lunch-time arguments, and friendly rivalries that never crossed the boundary of real danger, but these interactions slowly built emotional tension between characters, especially between Harris and Jekuna, whose rivalry had become a silent understanding of competition rather than pure hostility, even though neither of them openly accepted respect for the other.

Harlina often found herself observing Harris during these days, noticing how he still chose isolation after every conflict, always returning to the terrace regardless of what happened during the day, as if distance from others was still his natural emotional defense mechanism, even though small changes in him had begun to appear over time that suggested he was slowly learning how to exist within human connection without completely withdrawing from it.

Then everything changed without warning.

It began on an ordinary school day when the sky above Ravnym Academy darkened in an unnatural way that did not match weather patterns, and an unusual pressure spread across the entire environment, making students feel uneasy without knowing why, as if reality itself had slightly shifted out of alignment with normal existence, and teachers immediately sensed that something was wrong beyond standard school issues or student conflicts.

Koji was the first to recognize that this was not normal, and his expression immediately changed as he sensed something far deeper approaching the academy, something that did not belong to human conflict or natural events, and he ordered immediate evacuation, but before anything could be properly organized, the ground near the outer region of the school distorted violently and a shadow-like entity began emerging from what looked like a fracture in space itself.

Koji

The entity fully manifested into a massive void creature whose presence alone distorted the air, creating visual instability, pressure waves, and fear that spread instantly among students, turning normal school life into chaos within seconds, as everyone ran in different directions trying to escape something they could not understand or classify within their known reality.

At that exact moment, Harris and Jekuna were forced into the same survival zone, trapped near the central school area where the creature had begun its attack, and despite their rivalry, they were forced into temporary cooperation because survival instinct overrode emotional conflict, creating an unstable alliance where neither fully trusted the other but both understood that fighting separately would lead to immediate death.

The void creature attacked indiscriminately, destroying structures and sending shockwaves across the academy, while Koji attempted to protect students but was struck during the process, resulting in a severe injury that broke his hand while shielding multiple students from a direct attack that would have otherwise caused mass casualties.

Roku and Reku attempted to fight back using experimental laser-based energy weapons they had developed over time, but their attacks were unstable and insufficient to damage the creature significantly, only managing to slow its movement temporarily while the battlefield continued to collapse into chaos, smoke, debris, and emotional breakdown among students.

For two full days, the battle continued in cycles of exhaustion, survival, regrouping, and renewed attacks, as students, teachers, rival groups, and even enemies were forced to cooperate in shifting formations just to survive, while Harlina continuously provided strategic direction that helped prevent total collapse of the remaining survivors, and even Jekuna's group participated in coordinated attacks despite their usual opposition to Harris.

Throughout this prolonged conflict, Harris began experiencing unusual internal reactions, as if something deep inside him was responding to the presence of the void creature, not as fear, but as recognition, creating emotional instability that he could not understand, as his instincts occasionally reacted before his thoughts could form.

Harlina

Harlina noticed these subtle changes in him, especially how his reactions during the battle were slightly different from others, as if his presence was indirectly affecting the battlefield in ways that were not yet visible or fully awakened, and she continued guiding group coordination while staying emotionally aware of Harris's condition even in the middle of chaos.

As the second day reached its final stage, the void creature entered its last destructive phase, preparing a final attack that could have wiped out the remaining survivors, but a perfectly timed coordinated strategy formed through combined efforts of Harris's group, Harlina's planning, Roku and Reku's remaining energy output, Koji's injured but critical guidance, and even Jekuna's aggressive front-line pressure, creating a rare moment of unified resistance against a single overwhelming enemy.

In the final moment before destruction, as the creature's body began collapsing into unstable fragments of void energy, its consciousness locked onto Harris Ravi, and for a brief instant it perceived something deeper within him that no one else could see, something that did not belong to normal human existence, and in its final recognition before complete dissolution it silently identified him as the "Void Walker," marking the first indirect revelation of his hidden nature.

And when the creature finally disintegrated completely, leaving behind silence, destruction, and exhaustion across Ravnym Academy, the survivors stood in shock and emotional collapse after two days of continuous chaos, unaware that this event was not the end of their suffering but only the first true crack in reality that would eventually lead them toward something far larger, while Harris Ravi remained standing quietly among the ruins, still not understanding what had just been awakened inside the world or why something within him felt slightly different after the battle had ended.

VOID WALKER — SEASON 1

CHAPTER 3: "AFTER THE VOID — THE PAIN THAT DID NOT END"

After the catastrophic two-day void incident that had shattered Ravnym Academy into a state of emotional collapse and forced survival, the world around Harris Ravi slowly attempted to return to what people called normal life, yet nothing about that normality felt real anymore because every corridor, every classroom, every broken structure, and every silent gaze of surviving students carried the memory of something that had once existed beyond human understanding, and in the aftermath of that battle the academy was transformed into a recovery zone where injured students, exhausted teachers, and emotionally broken survivors were being transported into medical care systems that tried to treat not only physical wounds but also psychological trauma that no one had ever experienced at such scale, yet even in this structured recovery environment Harris did not behave like others because despite suffering multiple injuries including a head injury that caused constant dizziness and bleeding, along with deep wounds across his hands from collapsing debris during the battle, he refused immediate hospitalization and instead moved through the damaged academy grounds searching for the people he had fought alongside and even those he had once considered rivals, as if something inside him refused to accept the idea of resting while others remained unconscious or unprotected, and in that broken environment he found Jekuna and his group scattered and injured but alive, and he helped stabilize them without hesitation even though their relationship had been defined by rivalry and conflict for years, while at the same time he also located Harlina who had sustained a serious head injury during the final phase of the battle and had eventually lost consciousness due to exhaustion and trauma, and despite his own worsening condition Harris carried, supported, and guided unconscious or injured individuals toward safer zones without prioritizing his own survival, moving through unstable debris-filled corridors and partially collapsed school structures while his vision blurred and his body weakened, as if survival instincts no longer applied to him in the same way they applied to others, and for him the only thing that mattered was ensuring that no one who had stood beside him during that impossible battle was left behind in silence or death, and when the immediate chaos finally ended and survivors were officially transferred into emergency care units, Harris was not properly tracked by medical staff due to his constant movement and refusal of treatment, leading to a situation where he quietly disappeared into isolation, and three days after the incident he was found sitting alone once again on the school terrace, the same place that had always symbolized his emotional distance from the world, but now even that distance felt heavier because his injuries had worsened due to lack of treatment and continuous physical strain, and his body showed visible signs of exhaustion while his mind repeatedly replayed the final moments of the void creature's death and the strange recognition it had directed toward him, as if something fundamental about his existence had been acknowledged by an entity that did not belong to normal reality, while inside the recovery system Harlina had been moved to medical observation along with other injured students, slowly regaining consciousness after hours of unconsciousness caused by the intensity of the battle, and when she finally opened her eyes her first instinct was not to ask about her condition or the academy, but to ask about Harris, questioning where he was and why he was not present, and those around her responded uncertainly that he had also been injured and admitted into hospital systems but had not remained under consistent treatment due to his refusal and disappearance during recovery procedures, and over the following days

while most students gradually recovered and returned to basic routines, Harlina recovered faster than expected emotionally even if her body still carried weakness, and instead of staying confined she began searching for Harris across multiple locations including the academy grounds, nearby streets, and even his known resting places, slowly gathering fragmented information from nurses, students, and staff until she finally learned that he had been seen near his house but appeared unstable and exhausted due to untreated injuries and continuous physical neglect, and when she finally reached him she found him sitting alone in a weakened state, his body visibly affected by both the battle and the lack of medical attention, while his eyes remained fixed on the sky as if searching for answers that had no language, and without hesitation she immediately called Koji and informed him along with Roku and Reku, and even Jekuna was informed and arrived despite his rivalry due to the fact that Harris had saved him during the void battle without hesitation, creating a complicated emotional acknowledgment between enemies who had survived something far beyond school conflict, and Koji arrived soon after and immediately assessed Harris's condition with serious concern, realizing that his injuries had reached a dangerous stage due to prolonged neglect and lack of treatment, forcing emergency hospitalization where Harris was finally placed under proper medical care, stabilizing his condition through continuous treatment and rest, and after several days of unconscious recovery Harris slowly regained awareness inside the hospital room, where he found Harlina, Roku, Reku, and others present, their expressions filled with frustration, concern, and emotional exhaustion as they confronted him about his reckless refusal to take care of himself despite everything that had happened, and Harlina in particular questioned him directly with visible anger and worry asking why he had ignored his injuries and refused medicine even when his condition was clearly dangerous, but Harris did not respond, not because he lacked understanding, but because his mind was still trapped within the memory of the void creature's final recognition and the strange implication that something inside him had been identified as "Void Walker," and as silence filled the room his thoughts drifted between confusion and realization, slowly understanding that even though he had ignored his own survival there were still people who cared about him enough to search for him, worry about him, and bring him back from collapse, and this emotional contradiction created something unstable inside him because for the first time he realized that his existence had an effect on others beyond simple presence, and as days passed his physical condition gradually improved while emotional tension remained unresolved between him and his friends, especially Harlina who continued to show concern mixed with frustration over his self-destructive behavior, while Roku and Reku tried to lighten the situation through conversation and Jekuna remained silent but noticeably affected by the fact that Harris had risked his life to save even his enemies during the battle, and slowly the academy returned to normal routine with classes restarting, students resuming daily life, and the memory of the void incident becoming a shared trauma that everyone tried to suppress, yet for Harris nothing truly returned to normal because every moment of silence reminded him of the void creature and its final recognition, and even while sitting in classrooms or returning to the terrace he continued to think about the possibility that something within him was connected to that unknown force that had entered their world, and as time slowly stabilized around Ravnym Academy the emotional weight inside Harris continued to grow quietly without expression, until finally he stood alone once again beneath the sky that now felt different than before, and in his mind a single thought echoed with unsettling clarity as if marking the transition from recovery into something far more unknown, and that thought remained unresolved as the chapter closed in silence: “This is not the end… this is the beginning.”

VOID WALKER — SEASON 1

CHAPTER 4: “THE BOOK OF CRIMSON TRUTH — EXPANDED VERSION”

After the devastating void incident and the long recovery period that followed, Ravnym Academy had slowly begun to rebuild its daily rhythm, yet nothing about life felt truly normal anymore because the emotional aftermath of the battle lingered in every corner of the school like an invisible distortion that refused to disappear completely, and even though students resumed classes, training, and ordinary conversations, there remained an unspoken awareness that something beyond human understanding had once entered their world and had briefly touched reality itself, leaving behind questions that no one could answer, and in this atmosphere Koji found himself unable to let go of what he had witnessed during the battle, especially the moment when the void creature had directly recognized Harris Ravi before its destruction, as if acknowledging something hidden within him that defied explanation, and this growing suspicion pushed Koji into a deeper investigation beyond the academy’s permission or knowledge, where he began secretly accessing restricted archives, abandoned research facilities, and sealed historical data banks that contained fragments of forgotten planetary history that most people believed to be myth or symbolic fiction, yet felt disturbingly real when analyzed under modern energy readings, and during this dangerous pursuit he was joined by a newly introduced investigator named Lunar, a highly analytical and emotionally calm researcher whose expertise in ancient energy systems, dimensional residue mapping, and pre-modern planetary formation theory made him an invaluable partner in uncovering truths that ordinary scholars would dismiss as impossible fiction, and together Koji and Lunar formed an unlikely alliance driven not by trust but by necessity, as both were trying to understand a phenomenon that had already begun affecting reality in ways they could not ignore.

Koji

Lunar

Their investigation led them through layers of forbidden knowledge, where each discovery seemed to contradict established science and history, until eventually they reached a sealed underground archive hidden beneath an abandoned research facility that emitted faint unstable energy signals even before being opened, as if reacting to their presence, and when they finally breached the containment seals and accessed the interior, they discovered an ancient manuscript bound in unknown material that resisted normal physical damage and emitted subtle fluctuations of energy that seemed to respond to Koji's proximity in an unsettlingly precise way, and upon opening it they were immediately confronted with detailed records describing the origin of the world Ravnym, revealing that the planet itself was not formed through natural cosmic evolution as previously believed, but instead created during a catastrophic and repeating cosmic phenomenon known as the Crimson Eclipse, an event that occurs once every six hundred thousand years and fundamentally reshapes reality itself by destroying and reconstructing planetary existence through cycles of collapse and rebirth that no civilization has ever fully survived without intervention from a singular unknown entity.

The manuscript went further into describing a being known as the Void Walker, a unique existence that appears once during every Crimson Eclipse cycle, born approximately thirty-eight years before the event itself, whose existence is intrinsically tied to the survival or destruction of the world depending on how their power develops and is used, and according to the records, the Void Walker is not simply a person but a living convergence point of void energy and reality stability, meaning their emotional state, awareness, and growth directly influence planetary balance during the Eclipse cycle, and in previous cycles the Void Walker had sacrificed their own existence to seal catastrophic destruction caused by uncontrolled Eclipse energy, preventing total planetary annihilation but leaving behind fragments of void instability that eventually evolved into the anomalies seen in modern times, and this revelation created a heavy silence between Koji and Lunar as they realized they were not studying myth but a repeating existential cycle that had already shaped their world multiple times without public awareness.

The manuscript then revealed a far more disturbing detail that during each Void Walker cycle, a hidden structure known as the Void Throne manifests somewhere across the world at the moment of the Void Walker's birth, existing partially outside physical reality and partially within the void dimension, and only when the Void Walker physically or spiritually sits upon this throne does their true power begin to awaken, meaning that without this activation the Void Walker remains incomplete and unaware of their full potential, and the throne itself cannot be destroyed or relocated through normal means because it is anchored to dimensional coordinates that shift based on void resonance patterns, making it nearly impossible to locate without following specific energy trails left behind by void disturbances, and attached to the manuscript was a fragmented map containing broken coordinates and partial terrain references that pointed toward unknown regions beyond known civilization boundaries, suggesting that the throne had been scattered or hidden across unstable dimensional zones.

As Koji studied these details further, a horrifying realization formed inside his mind that if the Crimson Eclipse cycle was indeed approaching within the next twenty-five years as indicated in the manuscript, then the Void Walker of this current cycle must already exist somewhere within the world, living an ordinary life without awareness of their true identity, and this thought immediately triggered a shift in Koji's entire investigative direction as he began searching for individuals who displayed abnormal emotional responses, unexplained energy reactions, and instability patterns similar to those described in the ancient text, unknowingly bringing his focus closer and closer to Harris Ravi without yet confirming his identity, while Lunar remained cautiously analytical, warning that premature awakening of Void Walker awareness could destabilize the emotional balance required for survival during the Eclipse cycle.

Meanwhile, back at Ravnym Academy, life continued under a fragile sense of normality, but subtle emotional transformations had begun occurring among the main group, especially between Harris and Jekuna, whose rivalry had slowly evolved into a more complex relationship shaped by shared survival during the void incident, where both had witnessed each other's limits and vulnerabilities, and over time their interactions became less hostile and more restrained, as if silent respect had begun forming beneath their competitive surface, even though neither openly acknowledged it, and small conversations occasionally replaced direct confrontation, creating an unusual dynamic where rivalry still existed but was no longer purely antagonistic.

Jekuna

Harris Ravi

At the same time, Harlina's emotional connection to Harris deepened significantly during this period, as she began to perceive his silence not as emptiness but as emotional weight accumulated from years of isolation, and every time she observed him sitting alone on the terrace or distancing himself from others, she felt a growing emotional pull that she could no longer define as simple concern, because it had transformed into something more personal and vulnerable, especially after witnessing how he risked his life repeatedly for others during the void incident without hesitation, and this realization made her quietly accept that her feelings for him had moved beyond friendship into something she was not yet ready to express openly.

Harlina

Meanwhile Koji and Lunar's investigation began entering more dangerous territory as they followed fragmented energy signals derived from the map within the manuscript, leading them through unstable environmental zones where reality itself felt inconsistent, including regions where spatial distance fluctuated unnaturally, where sound behaved irregularly, and where void residue appeared to resist human presence as if the world itself was actively concealing the location of the Void Throne, and each step deeper into this journey reinforced the idea that the throne was not simply a physical object but a dimensional anchor tied to the emotional and existential state of the Void Walker, reacting subtly to their proximity without ever fully revealing its position.

During this journey, Koji also began experiencing increasing psychological pressure as the implications of the prophecy grew heavier, because the manuscript suggested that the Void Walker's awakening was not a voluntary process but a forced convergence triggered by external cosmic conditions, meaning that Harris or whoever the Void Walker was would eventually be drawn into awakening whether they understood it or not, and this realization created internal conflict within Koji as he struggled between revealing the truth immediately or allowing events to unfold naturally to avoid premature instability.

As the chapter moved toward its emotional core, Harris continued living unaware of the full cosmic significance of his existence, while slowly feeling subtle internal changes that he could not explain, Harlina silently grew emotionally closer to him without confession, Jekuna developed reluctant friendship masked as rivalry, and Koji moved dangerously closer to discovering the truth of his identity, while Lunar carefully documented every anomaly to prevent catastrophic misinterpretation of the prophecy, and all paths gradually aligned toward the approaching Crimson Eclipse, a cosmic cycle that would determine whether the world would continue its existence or collapse into void reconstruction, and the final line of the manuscript echoed through Koji's mind like an irreversible warning that could no longer be ignored: the Crimson Eclipse returns once every six hundred thousand years, and when it arrives, the Void Walker will either become the salvation of existence… or the trigger of its complete end.

VOID WALKER — SEASON 1

CHAPTER 5: "THE VOID THRONE — THE OATH THAT REWRITES EXISTENCE"

After two long years had passed since Koji and Lunar first uncovered the forbidden truth hidden inside the ancient manuscript regarding the Crimson Eclipse and the existence of the Void Walker, the world of Ravnym had completely transformed from a normal academy environment into a hidden survival-driven expedition reality where nothing could be considered ordinary anymore, because every step, every mission, and every investigation now carried the weight of a cosmic cycle that had already destroyed civilizations in the past and was now slowly approaching again, and under Koji's leadership the group of fighters who had once been students and teachers had become a fractured but united survival unit bound not by comfort but by shared trauma, responsibility, and the terrifying knowledge that their world was not permanent but cyclical, and Koji, burdened with knowledge far beyond human psychological limits, continued working alongside Lunar to decode the remaining fragments of the ancient manuscript, which behaved not like a normal written artifact but like a living void-reactive intelligence that shifted its responses depending on emotional proximity, environmental instability, and unknown dimensional resonance patterns, making every stage of their research dangerous and unpredictable.

Koji

Lunar

During one of their late-night decoding sessions inside a sealed underground archive filled with unstable energy readings, Koji finally addressed the group of fighters who had survived the original void monster incident, saying in a heavy voice, “What I’m about to tell you is not theory anymore… it is survival preparation,” and one fighter asked nervously, “Preparation for what exactly?” and Koji replied without hesitation, “For the return of a cycle that has already ended this world before,” while Lunar added quietly, “And will do so again unless something interrupts it,” and this immediately silenced everyone, before Koji revealed the hidden condition within the manuscript that changed everything they thought they knew: that the Void Walker could not be identified through strength, appearance, or combat ability, but only through a unique resonance reaction between the manuscript and its true bearer, and that when this resonance occurred, a marking would appear on the bearer’s chest that would remain invisible under normal conditions and only become observable when void energy alignment and dimensional synchronization reached a specific threshold, making identification nearly impossible without direct exposure.

One of the fighters swallowed nervously and asked, “So… we could already be standing next to the Void Walker and never know?” and Koji replied coldly, “That is exactly the problem,” while Lunar added, “Or exactly the design.”

For months after this revelation, Koji initiated controlled trials where individuals from different regions were invited to hold the manuscript under monitored conditions, and during one such trial a nervous participant joked, “If I’m the chosen one, do I at least get paid for it?” and Koji responded instantly, “If you are, you will not have a normal life to spend it on,” while Lunar quietly said, “Do not treat it as selection… treat it as exposure,” and slowly the atmosphere around these experiments became heavier as month after month passed without any visible reaction, causing doubt to spread among the fighters, until one of them muttered, “Maybe this whole prophecy is just broken history,” and Koji responded sharply, “Or maybe we are simply not ready for the truth.”

Meanwhile Harris continued living his life inside Ravnym Academy, though nothing about him felt normal anymore, as subtle internal changes had begun manifesting in ways he could not explain, including moments where he instinctively reacted to emotional danger before it happened or felt strange pressure in his chest when void residue was nearby, and although he dismissed these sensations as trauma effects, they were actually faint synchronization responses to the Void system itself, while his friends continued to evolve emotionally around him.

Harlina

Roku

Reku

One evening on the academy terrace, Roku looked at Harris and said casually, “Bro, you always stare at the sky like it owes you answers,” and Harris replied without turning, “Maybe it does,” and Roku laughed, “That’s the most dangerous answer you could give in a normal school,” while Reku added, “Normal? He stopped being normal the day he decided silence was his default setting,” and Harlina, standing slightly behind them, quietly observed and thought, He doesn’t look at the sky for answers… he looks like he’s waiting for something to answer him back.

As time passed, Harlina’s emotional bond toward Harris deepened beyond friendship into something she could no longer ignore, especially during missions where he placed himself in danger without hesitation, and one night during travel she quietly said while watching him rest, “You always act like pain doesn’t reach you… but I see it,” and she gently placed a cloth over his injured hand, whispering, “Why do you protect everyone… except yourself?” and Harris, half-awake, replied softly, “Because if I stop protecting them… I might not know what I am anymore,” and Harlina responded quietly, “Then let me remind you,” but he did not answer.

Jekuna

Even Jekuna’s relationship with Harris evolved during this long journey, and during one training session after surviving a void residue attack, Jekuna said, “You really enjoy being the center of every disaster, don’t you?” and Harris replied, “You’re always there too,” and Jekuna smirked, “Don’t misunderstand… I still want to defeat you,” but after a pause he added quietly, “But not if you die before I do,” and Harris simply said, “Then try not to die first,” marking a silent shift from rivalry to reluctant mutual dependence.

The journey toward the Void Throne intensified when Koji and Lunar finally decoded a convergence point in the fragmented manuscript map, leading them toward a region where reality itself began behaving abnormally, and Koji warned, “From this point forward, the world will not behave like the world,” while Lunar added, “And something else will start behaving like it instead,” and as they advanced deeper into the zone, gravity began fluctuating unpredictably, sound lagged or distorted mid-air, and spatial distortions caused short-range displacement effects that made movement unstable.

At one point Roku stumbled and shouted, “This place is messing with my head!” and Reku shouted back, “It’s not just your head, idiot! Look at the ground!” while Koji immediately said, “Stay aligned or you will lose spatial consistency,” and Lunar added calmly, “Do not trust distance here… it lies,” and Harris, holding injured ground, said, “Then we move without trusting anything,” which made Roku mutter, “Why does he always sound like the final boss in training?”

During repeated battles with void-corrupted entities that emerged from fractured reality zones, Harris consistently took the front line despite worsening injuries, and Koji shouted, “Harris, you cannot keep doing this!” and Harris replied, blocking an attack, “If I stop here, they reach you,” while Harlina screamed, “You’ll die like this!” and Harris answered quietly, “Then I die moving forward,” which left her shaken and silent.

One night during rest, Roku looked at Harris and said more seriously than usual, “You’re not normal… and I don’t think you ever were,” and Harris replied, “Normal doesn’t survive what we saw,” and Reku added softly, “Then what do we become?” and Harris paused before saying, “Whatever survives.”

Harlina later sat beside Harris and whispered, “Do you ever think about yourself?” and he replied, “No,” and she asked, “Not even once?” and he said quietly, “If I do… I stop moving,” and she replied with pain in her voice, “Then I’ll think for you too,” and he did not respond.

Finally, after months of suffering, travel, and continuous survival battles, they reached the Void Throne Gate, a massive sealed structure existing between reality and something beyond it, where silence had physical weight and even breathing felt unnatural, and Koji said in a shaken voice, “This is the center of everything we have been chasing,” while Lunar confirmed, “Every fragment, every signal… converged here,” and

Roku whispered, “So this is it… the place where everything either makes sense or ends,” and Reku added, “I hate how quiet it is.”

Jekuna looked at the gate and muttered, “It feels like it’s waiting,” while Koji slowly turned toward Harris without saying anything, and Harlina softly said, “Harris…” and for the first time Harris stepped forward not as a student, not as a survivor, but as something unknown even to himself, and said:

“I don’t know what this place is… or what I am supposed to become here… but if everything led to this moment…”

He looked back at everyone — Koji, Lunar, Roku, Reku, Jekuna, and Harlina — and continued:

“Then I won’t run from it.”

He turned back to the gate and said with absolute calm:

“I will save this world for my friends.”

And the moment those words left his mouth, the Void Throne Gate did not open… but the entire space around it reacted faintly, as if reality itself had just acknowledged the arrival of something it had been waiting for across cycles of destruction and rebirth.
